

After a full week of nights spent in the tent, I spent my first one in a Guest House, in the village of Lauvargatn- the last oasis along my route. I took advantage of running water to wash my clothes, then left them to dry on the radiators. After that, I went to the village's only shop and bought my final food supplies. I exchanged a few words with the locals under the pretext of asking for information, and I found them helpful - and quite curious about me. I left Lauvargatn with my thirst for adventure at its peak. I sang at the top of my lungs, unleashing my entire repertoire for several kilometers until - perhaps because of that - one of the wheels of my pulka literally exploded under the strain and weight. A real, unexpected disaster: the tear in the tire was so large that repairing it was impossible. So, without hesitation, I decided to remove both tires from the wheel rims and retrace my steps back to the village, hoping to find some kind of solution. Unfortunately, the only small hardware shop in the area had no wheels of any kind. The only option left, if I wanted to continue my expedition, was to contact my friend Matteo. Matteo didn't need to be asked twice - in fact, he didn't even let me finish explaining. He knows very well how important this adventure is to me, so the next morning he reached the village with his 4x4, bringing a brand-new wheel. You can imagine my happiness - not only for the new wheel and what it meant for my journey, but also for the confirmation that I had found a true friend.
